ABSTRACT

When a user of a computer seeks a printer having certain capabilities among a large population of printers dispersed over a large geographical area, the user consults a substantially open database of geographical data about each of the population of printers. Relational data is used with the geographical data to determine an effective distance of each suitable printer to a predetermined location. The effective distance determination can take into account distances within a building, or among different buildings.